WINE CELLARS

Few wine cellars tucked into mountain-side in Aspen with building brands of bottles, wine storage has become a desirable amenity with homeowners. Architects and builders are creating space large and small above ground and in subterranean settings. In wine lovers to visit, sip and share their favorite vintages.

Having wine storage is almost expected in luxury homes. Robert H. Hardy, president of Colorado Wine Cellar Design, based in Scottsdale, Arizona, when he started his business in 2002, realized that wine and consumers wanted wine rooms with wood storage racks and bins. That changed dramatically starting about six years ago.

"Almost everything we now do is traditional in contemporary," he says of his company's refrigerated wine walls with built-in metal shelving for bottles, which pour labels on display. "There's a glass on these cases, and when it's against a wall, the back can be stone, tile or even glass. The labels are really pretty and add to the overall value in making the wall the focal point of a room."

While wine walls can hold thousands of bottles, larger collections pose additional design challenges. That's what led architect Eric Logan to create a wine site for Wyoming's Granite Logans, a principal at Colony Logans in Jackson, describing the project as "a bit of an odyssey."
