

INTERIORS

INSIDE THE AMERICAN HOME

Introduction by Marc Kristal

YELLOWBELL

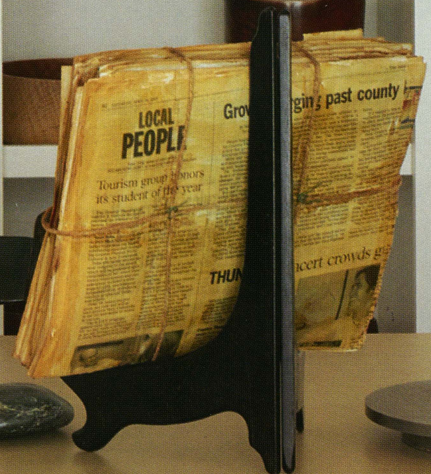

CARNEY LOGAN BURKE ARCHITECTS

This once rustic log house in Jackson Hole has been transformed into a contemporary family home. The refurbishment began by stripping out an overwhelming moss rock fireplace and gutting an inefficient master suite. Several log walls were concealed by drywall to create lighting coves and space for the owner's extensive art collection. An alabaster tinted lacquer was applied to both log and plaster walls, brightening and uniting the new and existing construction. Original wide-plank circle-sawn Douglas fir floors were refinished to a smooth, ebony appearance.

Existing quartzite flagstone flooring was replaced with a flamed and brushed limestone. The casework throughout utilizes quarter-sawn white oak, paired with engineered quartz countertops.

The exterior logs were glass blasted to remove years of UV-degraded and yellowed varnish. A penetrating muted blue-gray finish (picking up tones of the limestone paving that carries from the interior to the exterior) was then applied. The appearance of the home now deftly straddles the line between a rustic retreat and the gallery feel of the interior renovation.

Location: Jackson, Wyoming Area: 4600 ft² (427 m²) Completed: 2015 Photography: Mathew Millman

Original wide-plank circle-sawn Douglas fir floors were refinished to a smooth, ebony appearance.

